

I am writing this comment in response to my overwhelming disapproval of telemarketers. Few things are still sacred in our society, however, one that should always remain so is that of time with family. I pay for my telephone service. I pay the required taxes and service fees. No bank has ever payed any of these for me. So, why is it that they feel they have the right to my phone, or for that matter my time? If I want to have business with a bank, I will let them know. If a bank wants to offer me the opportunity of a lifetime, they can send it in writing. Too many times I have been told one thing on the phone and another in writing. It is time for politicians and the FCC to represent the citizens of this country. Stop groveling at the feet of banks and corporations! Don't sell out the American public yet again! Why are we fighting for people in other countries to have rights, but losing our own? Overwhelmingly, people in my state and many others have opted to be placed on "No Call" lists. Isn't it time to let the people choose?
